THE PADDOCK PICKS / NOVEMBER 2026

The Beginner’s Guide to Horse Racing

Seven guides to reading a race, understanding odds and tickets, and keeping a record.

thepaddockpicks.com

Contents

03 Horse Racing Handicapping for Beginners

04 How to Identify Horse Racing Contenders

05 How to Read Horse Racing Odds

10 Horse Racing Bet Types Explained

16 How to Make a Horse Racing Betting Plan

17 How to Use Horse Racing Picks on Race Day

23 How to Track Horse Racing Picks and Results

November 2026 edition

Horse Racing Handicapping for Beginners

Learn how distance, surface and pace shape a horse race.

Start with the conditions

Compare today’s distance and surface with each runner’s recent races. A dirt sprinter faces a different test stretching out on turf.

Sketch the pace

Two horses that usually lead may push each other early and help a runner sitting just behind them. If either scratches, revisit your pace scenario.

Keep learning

- How to Identify Horse Racing Contenders
- How to Make a Horse Racing Betting Plan
- How to Track Horse Racing Picks and Results

Get early access to The Paddock

Wager only what you can afford to lose. No selection or strategy guarantees a return.

November 2026 edition

How to Identify Horse Racing Contenders

Turn a full field into a shortlist with a clear case for each horse.

Give each contender a reason

Write one sentence about how each horse could win. One may control the pace and another may have proven form at the distance. Then identify what could undo each case.

Separate likelihood from price

If you estimate a horse wins one time in four, 3–1 is the break-even price in a simplified win-bet calculation. Pari-mutuel odds can change before wagering closes.

Keep learning

- Horse Racing Handicapping for Beginners
- How to Make a Horse Racing Betting Plan
- How to Track Horse Racing Picks and Results

Get early access to The Paddock

Wager only what you can afford to lose. No selection or strategy guarantees a return.

November 2026 edition

How to Read Horse Racing Odds

You've reviewed The Paddock Picks' selections for an upcoming race. We've narrowed the field to three contenders and explained why each horse deserves attention.

Now you're looking at the odds and see numbers like 5-2, 3-1, and 8-1.

What do those numbers mean? And if you decide to place a $2 bet, how much could you win?

Understanding odds helps you take the next step from reviewing The Paddock's picks to deciding whether a wager makes sense.

What Do Horse Racing Odds Mean?

Odds tell you how much profit a winning bet would return relative to the amount wagered.

In horse racing, odds are commonly displayed as fractions:

- 2-1: A winning $2 bet earns $4 in profit.
- 5-2: A winning $2 bet earns $5 in profit.
- 5-1: A winning $2 bet earns $10 in profit.

You also receive your original wager back when you win.

Lower odds generally mean a horse is attracting more betting support. Higher odds mean a larger potential payout, but they do not automatically make a horse a better bet.

The horse with the lowest odds is called the favorite. A horse with much higher odds is often called a longshot.

How Much Does a $2 Win Bet Pay?

Let's use one of The Paddock's fictional contenders, Copper Ridge.

Copper Ridge is showing odds of 5-2.

You decide to place a $2 win bet, meaning Copper Ridge must finish first for your ticket to win.

	Amount
Your original bet	$2.00
Odds	5-2
Profit if Copper Ridge wins	$5.00

	Amount
Original bet returned	$2.00
Total payout	$7.00

If Copper Ridge wins at final odds of 5-2, you collect $7. Your actual profit is $5 because you originally wagered $2.

If Copper Ridge loses, you lose your $2 wager.

Here are a few other examples:

Odds	Profit on $2	Total payout
1-1	$2	$4
2-1	$4	$6
5-2	$5	$7
3-1	$6	$8
5-1	$10	$12
10-1	$20	$22

These are simplified theoretical payouts. Actual track payouts may differ slightly because displayed odds are rounded.

Morning Line Odds vs. Live Odds

When you open a racing program, you'll see odds listed beside each horse. These are called morning line odds.

The morning line is an estimate prepared before wagering begins. It predicts how the betting public may price each horse.

It is not a guaranteed payout or a prediction that a particular horse will win.

Live odds are different.

As people place bets, the odds change to reflect the money being wagered.

For example, one of The Paddock's contenders might have morning line odds of 5-1. As more people bet on that horse, the live odds could drop to 3-1 or even 2-1.

That means the potential payout has become smaller.

The reverse can also happen. If relatively less money is bet on the horse, its odds may rise.

In most U.S. horse racing, your payout is based on the final betting pool, not necessarily the odds displayed when you placed your wager.

Why Do Odds Change?

Horse racing generally uses a system called pari-mutuel betting.

Rather than receiving a guaranteed fixed price from a bookmaker, bettors contribute money to betting pools. After deductions, the available money is distributed among winning wagers.

As the pools change, the odds adjust.

You don't need to study every calculation to use The Paddock's selections. Just remember:

- More betting support generally means lower odds.
- Less relative support generally means higher odds.
- Odds can change significantly before the race.
- The final payout is determined after wagering closes and the pools are calculated.

Checking the current odds is an important part of deciding whether to bet.

How Odds Help You Evaluate The Paddock's Contenders

This is where The Paddock's analysis and the available betting prices come together.

Imagine we've identified three contenders in a fictional race:

Horse	Live odds	The Paddock's assessment
#2 Copper Ridge	2-1	Top contender
#5 Harbor Light	4-1	Strong alternative
#7 Desert Echo	10-1	Possible longshot

The Paddock has already narrowed the field and provided the reasoning behind each selection.

Now you can compare those contenders against their current prices.

Copper Ridge may be the strongest contender, but its 2-1 odds offer a smaller potential payout.

Harbor Light offers 4-1. That could be more appealing if you believe its chance of winning is better than the price suggests.

Desert Echo offers a much larger payout, but its higher odds don't automatically make it a bargain.

A strong contender isn't necessarily a good bet at every price.

You also shouldn't treat The Paddock's ranking as an exact mathematical probability of winning.

For a deeper explanation of how the shortlist is developed, see How to Identify Horse Racing Contenders.

What About Exacta and Trifecta Bets?

The Paddock's three-contender approach can also help you consider bets involving more than one horse.

An exacta requires the first two horses in the correct order. A trifecta requires the first three in the correct order.

Unlike a win bet, you cannot calculate these payouts directly from the horses' displayed win odds. Exactas and trifectas have their own betting pools.

Understanding the contenders is one part of the decision. Understanding ticket costs and potential returns is another.

Read Horse Racing Bet Types Explained for simple examples using The Paddock's three-contender shortlist.

A Simple Checklist Before You Bet

After reviewing The Paddock's picks, ask yourself:

1. Do I understand the current odds for the contenders?
2. Am I looking at morning line odds or live odds?
3. How much would my ticket return if it wins?
4. Does the potential payout justify the uncertainty and risk?
5. Am I comfortable losing the entire amount I'm wagering?

You don't need to bet every race.

Sometimes The Paddock may identify strong contenders, but the available prices or other uncertainties don't justify a wager.

The Bottom Line

The Paddock Picks does the initial analysis so you can focus on a manageable shortlist instead of studying the entire racing program.

Understanding the odds helps you evaluate those selections, compare possible payouts, and make your own betting decisions.

Remember the difference between profit and total payout, check the current odds, and consider both the contenders and the prices.

Less time analyzing. Fewer choices to consider. Better-informed betting decisions.

No horse racing selection or wagering strategy guarantees a return. Set a budget, understand the full cost of your bets, and wager only what you can afford to lose.

Related guides

Horse Racing Bet Types Explained

How to Use Horse Racing Picks on Race Day

How The Paddock Picks Analyzes Horse Races

November 2026 edition

Horse Racing Bet Types Explained

You've reviewed The Paddock Picks' selections for today's races and found a few contenders you like. Now comes the next question: What kind of bet should you make?

Horse racing offers plenty of wagering options, but you don't need to understand all of them to enjoy a day at the track.

We'll focus on five common bets: win, place, show, exacta, and trifecta. You'll learn what each ticket needs to win, how much it costs, and how The Paddock's three-contender shortlist can help you understand your options.

Start With The Paddock's Three Contenders

Imagine The Paddock has analyzed a fictional eight-horse race and identified these three contenders:

Horse	Program #	The Paddock's assessment
Copper Ridge	#2	Top contender
Harbor Light	#5	Strong alternative
Desert Echo	#7	Possible longshot

The Paddock has done the initial handicapping work. You have a manageable shortlist and an explanation of why each horse deserves consideration.

Now let's see how different wagers could use those selections.

Win: Your Horse Must Finish First

A win bet is the simplest wager.

Suppose you agree with The Paddock's assessment of Copper Ridge (#2) and decide to bet $2 to win.

Copper Ridge must finish first for your ticket to win. Finishing second or third won't be enough.

If Copper Ridge wins at final odds of 3-1, your $2 wager would theoretically return $8, including your original stake.

For more on payouts and changing prices, read How to Read Horse Racing Odds.

Place: First or Second

A place wager wins if your selected horse finishes first or second.

Perhaps you like Harbor Light (#5), one of The Paddock's other contenders, but aren't confident it will win.

You could choose a $2 place bet instead.

Place payouts come from a separate betting pool and are generally smaller than win payouts on the same horse.

Show: Finish in the Top Three

A show bet wins if your horse finishes first, second, or third.

You might consider a show wager on Desert Echo (#7) if you think it has a reasonable chance of finishing among the top three.

Show bets cover more finishing positions, but generally pay less than win or place bets.

Remember, The Paddock identifying a horse as a contender doesn't mean it is guaranteed to finish in the money.

Exacta: Pick the First Two Horses in Order

This is where The Paddock's shortlist becomes especially useful.

An exacta requires you to identify the first two finishers in the correct order.

Suppose The Paddock has Copper Ridge (#2) as its top contender and Harbor Light (#5) as a strong alternative.

You might decide to play a $1 straight exacta:

2–5

Your ticket wins only if Copper Ridge finishes first and Harbor Light finishes second.

If Harbor Light wins and Copper Ridge finishes second, your straight exacta loses.

What Is an Exacta Box?

What if you like both contenders but aren't sure which will win?

An exacta box covers both possible finishing orders.

A $1 exacta box using #2 and #5 includes:

- 2–5
- 5–2

That's two combinations at $1 each, for a total cost of $2.

Using All Three Paddock Contenders

Suppose you also like The Paddock's longshot, Desert Echo (#7).

A three-horse exacta box using #2, #5, and #7 covers six combinations:

Combination	First	Second
2–5	Copper Ridge	Harbor Light
2–7	Copper Ridge	Desert Echo
5–2	Harbor Light	Copper Ridge
5–7	Harbor Light	Desert Echo
7–2	Desert Echo	Copper Ridge
7–5	Desert Echo	Harbor Light

The cost is:

3 horses × 2 possible partners × $1 = $6

A three-horse exacta box is easy to understand because every pairing of The Paddock's three contenders is included in both orders.

But there's an important limitation: If a horse outside the shortlist finishes first or second, the ticket loses.

That's why a shortlist is a starting point for evaluating a wager, not a reason to automatically box all three horses in every race.

Trifecta: Pick the First Three Horses in Order

A trifecta takes the exacta concept one step further.

You must correctly select the horses finishing first, second, and third, in the exact order.

Using our fictional Paddock contenders, a straight trifecta could be:

2–5–7

For this ticket to win:

- Copper Ridge (#2) must finish first.
- Harbor Light (#5) must finish second.
- Desert Echo (#7) must finish third.

Any other finishing order loses.

What Is a Trifecta Box?

If you believe all three Paddock contenders could finish in the top three but aren't sure of their order, a trifecta box covers all six possible arrangements.

Combination	First	Second	Third
2–5–7	#2	#5	#7
2–7–5	#2	#7	#5
5–2–7	#5	#2	#7
5–7–2	#5	#7	#2
7–2–5	#7	#2	#5
7–5–2	#7	#5	#2

At a $0.50 base wager:

6 combinations × $0.50 = $3 total

At a $1 base wager, the same box costs $6.

The important difference from an exacta is that a three-horse trifecta box requires all three selected horses to occupy the first three finishing positions, in any order.

If even one finishes fourth or worse, the ticket loses under normal race conditions.

Trifectas are more difficult to hit than simply choosing a winner, and they can be tempting because of their potential payouts. But a larger potential return doesn't necessarily make the wager worthwhile.

How Much Do Exacta and Trifecta Boxes Cost?

The Paddock focuses on narrowing the field, but you may occasionally want to include additional horses.

Here's how box costs increase:

Horses selected	$1 Exacta box	$0.50 Trifecta box
2	$2	—
3	$6	$3
4	$12	$12

Horses selected	$1 Exacta box	$0.50 Trifecta box
5	$20	$30

Exacta combinations are calculated as the number of horses multiplied by one less than that number.

Trifecta combinations multiply the number of horses by the next two smaller numbers.

Minimum wager amounts vary by track and wager type. Always confirm the available amounts before betting.

Worked Example: How Your Paddock-Based Tickets Perform

Let's say our fictional race finishes:

1st: #5 Harbor Light

2nd: #2 Copper Ridge

3rd: #7 Desert Echo

Here's what happens to several possible wagers:

Bet	Cost	Result
$2 Win on #2	$2	Loses
$2 Place on #2	$2	Wins
$2 Show on #7	$2	Wins
$1 Straight exacta 2–5	$1	Loses
$1 Exacta box 2, 5, 7	$6	Wins on 5–2
$0.50 Trifecta box 2, 5, 7	$3	Wins on 5–2–7

Both boxed tickets win because the finishing order is among their covered combinations.

But winning a ticket doesn't always mean making a profit. You still need to compare the actual payout against the cost of the entire ticket.

How Does This Fit Into The Paddock's Betting Plan?

The Paddock helps simplify the decision-making process by identifying contenders and presenting a betting assessment.

Our approach centers on three possible decisions:

Play: The race presents a wagering opportunity worth considering under the plan.

Caution: There are uncertainties that call for more selectivity.

Pass: The race doesn't present a suitable opportunity under the plan.

Even when The Paddock identifies three strong contenders, that doesn't automatically make an exacta or trifecta a good bet.

The cost, potential payout, and uncertainty all matter.

Read How to Make a Horse Racing Betting Plan to learn how to approach those decisions.

The Bottom Line

The Paddock Picks helps you narrow the field and understand which horses deserve attention.

Understanding win, place, show, exacta, and trifecta bets helps you decide what to do with that information.

Start with manageable wagers, calculate the full ticket cost, and remember that passing a race is always an option.

Less time analyzing. Fewer choices to consider. Better-informed betting decisions.

Horse racing involves financial risk. No selection or wagering strategy guarantees a return. Set a budget and wager only what you can afford to lose.

Related guides

How to Read Horse Racing Odds

How to Make a Horse Racing Betting Plan

How to Use Horse Racing Picks on Race Day

November 2026 edition

How to Make a Horse Racing Betting Plan

Use Play, Caution and Pass to organize decisions before the race.

Set a limit before the card

Decide what you can afford to lose and set a race-by-race limit. Keep that limit after a loss. Count every combination in a ticket. A three-horse exacta box has six ordered combinations and costs $6 at a $1 base.

Define Play, Caution and Pass

Play means the race and price meet your criteria. Caution means you need to resolve an uncertainty, such as a late scratch changing the likely pace. Pass means the race fails your criteria.

Keep learning

- Horse Racing Handicapping for Beginners
- How to Identify Horse Racing Contenders
- How to Track Horse Racing Picks and Results

Get early access to The Paddock

Wager only what you can afford to lose. No selection or strategy guarantees a return.

November 2026 edition

How to Use Horse Racing Picks on Race Day

You don't need to spend hours studying racing programs to enjoy a day at the track.

Whether you're visiting the racetrack with friends, watching races from home, or simply looking for a few horses to follow, The Paddock Picks is designed to make race day easier.

We do the initial handicapping, narrow the field to three contenders, and explain why those horses deserve attention.

You review the selections, consider the available odds, and decide whether a wager makes sense.

Here's how to make the most of The Paddock Picks on race day.

Step 1: Find Today's Race and Contenders

Start with the track and race you're interested in.

A typical race might have eight, ten, or more horses. Each has its own racing history, running style, and strengths or weaknesses.

That's a lot of information to evaluate, especially if you're new to racing or simply want to enjoy the afternoon.

The Paddock simplifies that process by identifying three contenders worth considering.

Instead of sorting through every horse in the field, you begin with a short, manageable list.

Each selection should answer a simple question:

Why does this horse deserve attention?

The goal isn't to overwhelm you with statistics. It's to make the important information easier to understand.

Step 2: Understand the Three Selections

Not all contenders are alike.

One horse might have the strongest overall credentials. Another might be especially competitive under today's race conditions. A third could be an interesting longshot.

Let's look at a fictional example.

The Paddock's Contenders — Race 4

Horse	Program #	Assessment
Copper Ridge	#2	Top contender
Harbor Light	#5	Strong alternative
Desert Echo	#7	Possible longshot

Copper Ridge may have the strongest overall case, but that doesn't make the horse a guaranteed winner.

Harbor Light may offer another credible path to victory.

Desert Echo might have more questions surrounding its chances but deserves consideration if the price is attractive.

These explanations help you understand the selections without needing to become a racing handicapper yourself.

For a closer look at the process, read How to Identify Horse Racing Contenders.

Step 3: Check the Odds Before Deciding

Now that you know which horses The Paddock has identified, take a look at the current odds.

Odds determine the potential payout of a winning wager, and they can change as people place bets.

Suppose the three contenders are showing these fictional live odds:

Horse	Current odds
#2 Copper Ridge	2-1
#5 Harbor Light	4-1
#7 Desert Echo	10-1

Copper Ridge offers the smallest potential payout of the three. Desert Echo offers the largest, but may also be a less likely winner.

A horse's position on The Paddock's shortlist doesn't automatically tell you which one offers the best betting value.

You still need to consider the odds and your comfort with the uncertainty.

If the numbers are unfamiliar, our How to Read Horse Racing Odds guide explains them using simple $2 examples.

Step 4: Review the Betting Plan

Identifying contenders is only half the decision.

The next question is whether the race offers an opportunity worth considering.

The Paddock's approach uses three straightforward categories:

Play

The race presents a potential wagering opportunity under the betting plan. Review the suggested approach, odds, and full ticket cost before deciding.

Caution

The race contains uncertainties that deserve additional attention. A smaller wager, a different approach, or simply watching may be more appropriate.

Pass

The conditions don't support a wager under the plan. There's nothing wrong with enjoying the race without betting.

A Pass isn't a failure to make a pick. It's a decision not to put money at risk when the opportunity doesn't justify it.

And even when a race is classified as Play, wagering is always your choice.

How The Paddock Approaches Exacta Decisions

An exacta requires picking the first two horses in the correct finishing order. It sounds simple, but identifying two contenders isn't necessarily the same as identifying a worthwhile exacta bet.

That's where The Paddock's approach comes in.

Rather than presenting a long list of horses and leaving you to figure everything out, The Paddock narrows the field to three primary contenders and evaluates how they might perform against one another.

Our approach considers several important questions:

- Which horses are the strongest contenders? We evaluate available racing information to identify horses with credible chances of competing.
- How might the contenders finish? We consider their relative strengths and the potential race dynamics, recognizing that predicting the exact finishing order is more difficult than identifying competitive horses.
- What do the betting prices suggest? We examine the available odds and, when reliable data is available, exacta pricing to help distinguish an interesting combination from one offering a limited potential return.

- Does the wager justify its cost? A three-horse, $1 exacta box costs $6. Even if one combination wins, the payout must exceed $6 for the overall ticket to make a profit.
- Is passing the better decision? Not every race offers an attractive opportunity. Sometimes the most useful recommendation is to avoid a wager.

A Simple Example

Suppose The Paddock identifies these three fictional contenders:

Horse	Assessment
#2 Copper Ridge	Top contender
#5 Harbor Light	Strong alternative
#7 Desert Echo	Possible longshot

A three-horse exacta box would cover six combinations for $6 at a $1 base wager.

But The Paddock's objective isn't simply to identify three horses and automatically recommend boxing them.

The more important question is whether the contenders, possible finishing orders, available prices, and ticket cost support a reasonable betting decision.

The goal is not more bets. It's better-informed decisions about which opportunities deserve consideration.

The Paddock does the initial analysis. You review the selections, understand the reasoning, and decide whether to play, proceed cautiously, or pass.

Step 5: Understand the Ticket Before Betting

Suppose you like all three contenders in our fictional Race 4.

You might consider an exacta box using #2, #5, and #7.

An exacta requires you to select the first two finishers in the correct order.

A three-horse box covers all six possible first-and-second combinations among those horses.

At $1 per combination, the ticket costs $6.

You could also choose a simple win wager on one contender or decide not to bet at all.

The Paddock's shortlist helps narrow your options, but the wager you choose should fit your budget and understanding of the race.

Never assume that including more combinations automatically makes a wager worthwhile.

Our Horse Racing Bet Types Explained guide walks through win, place, show, exacta, and trifecta wagers, including their costs.

Step 6: Enjoy the Race and Review the Results

Once you've made your decision, it's time to enjoy the race.

Watch how the contenders perform. Did the expected frontrunner take the lead? Did a longshot make a late move? Did the race unfold differently than anticipated?

You don't need to analyze every detail, but seeing how the selections perform makes racing more interesting.

After the race, compare The Paddock's contenders with the official finishing order.

Remember that identifying the right contenders isn't the same as producing a profitable wager.

For example, an exacta box could include the winning combination yet return less than the full cost of the ticket.

Over time, tracking selections, wagers, and results gives a clearer picture than judging the approach by a single winning or losing race.

Our How to Track Horse Racing Picks and Results guide explains what information is useful to record.

A Simple Race-Day Routine

You can use The Paddock in just a few steps:

1. Find the race you're interested in.
2. Review The Paddock's three contenders and their explanations.
3. Check the current odds.
4. Consider the Play, Caution, or Pass assessment.
5. Understand the cost and conditions of any wager you choose.
6. Enjoy the race and review the results.

You don't need to master every handicapping statistic or betting strategy before participating.

And you don't have to bet every race.

The Bottom Line

Horse racing should be enjoyable, not another homework assignment.

The Paddock Picks is designed for people who want useful information without spending their entire race day analyzing past performances.

We narrow the field, explain the contenders, and help make the wagering decisions easier to understand.

You decide what to do with that information.

Less data. Fewer choices. Better-informed bets.

Horse racing involves risk. No selection or betting strategy guarantees a winning result. Set a budget before wagering and never bet more than you can afford to lose.

Related guides

How to Identify Horse Racing Contenders

How to Read Horse Racing Odds

Horse Racing Bet Types Explained

November 2026 edition

How to Track Horse Racing Picks and Results

Keep a record of picks, stakes, prices and passes for review.

Record the decision before post time

Log the date, track, race, selection, stake, acceptable odds and reason for the pick. Record passes with a zero stake so you can review why you sat out.

Review results across several cards

Record the official payout including any returned stake. If you wagered $40 and collected $34, your net result was a $6 loss and your return on stakes was –15%. Track refunds separately and keep the sample size visible.

Keep learning

- Horse Racing Handicapping for Beginners
- How to Identify Horse Racing Contenders
- How to Make a Horse Racing Betting Plan

Get early access to The Paddock

Wager only what you can afford to lose. No selection or strategy guarantees a return.