November 2026 edition

How to Use Horse Racing Picks on Race Day

You don't need to spend hours studying racing programs to enjoy a day at the track.

Whether you're visiting the racetrack with friends, watching races from home, or simply looking for a few horses to follow, The Paddock Picks is designed to make race day easier.

We do the initial handicapping, narrow the field to three contenders, and explain why those horses deserve attention.

You review the selections, consider the available odds, and decide whether a wager makes sense.

Here's how to make the most of The Paddock Picks on race day.

Step 1: Find Today's Race and Contenders

Start with the track and race you're interested in.

A typical race might have eight, ten, or more horses. Each has its own racing history, running style, and strengths or weaknesses.

That's a lot of information to evaluate, especially if you're new to racing or simply want to enjoy the afternoon.

The Paddock simplifies that process by identifying three contenders worth considering.

Instead of sorting through every horse in the field, you begin with a short, manageable list.

Each selection should answer a simple question:

Why does this horse deserve attention?

The goal isn't to overwhelm you with statistics. It's to make the important information easier to understand.

Step 2: Understand the Three Selections

Not all contenders are alike.

One horse might have the strongest overall credentials. Another might be especially competitive under today's race conditions. A third could be an interesting longshot.

Let's look at a fictional example.

The Paddock's Contenders — Race 4

Horse	Program #	Assessment
Copper Ridge	#2	Top contender
Harbor Light	#5	Strong alternative
Desert Echo	#7	Possible longshot

Copper Ridge may have the strongest overall case, but that doesn't make the horse a guaranteed winner.

Harbor Light may offer another credible path to victory.

Desert Echo might have more questions surrounding its chances but deserves consideration if the price is attractive.

These explanations help you understand the selections without needing to become a racing handicapper yourself.

For a closer look at the process, read How to Identify Horse Racing Contenders.

Step 3: Check the Odds Before Deciding

Now that you know which horses The Paddock has identified, take a look at the current odds.

Odds determine the potential payout of a winning wager, and they can change as people place bets.

Suppose the three contenders are showing these fictional live odds:

Horse	Current odds
#2 Copper Ridge	2-1
#5 Harbor Light	4-1
#7 Desert Echo	10-1

Copper Ridge offers the smallest potential payout of the three. Desert Echo offers the largest, but may also be a less likely winner.

A horse's position on The Paddock's shortlist doesn't automatically tell you which one offers the best betting value.

You still need to consider the odds and your comfort with the uncertainty.

If the numbers are unfamiliar, our How to Read Horse Racing Odds guide explains them using simple $2 examples.

Step 4: Review the Betting Plan

Identifying contenders is only half the decision.

The next question is whether the race offers an opportunity worth considering.

The Paddock's approach uses three straightforward categories:

Play

The race presents a potential wagering opportunity under the betting plan. Review the suggested approach, odds, and full ticket cost before deciding.

Caution

The race contains uncertainties that deserve additional attention. A smaller wager, a different approach, or simply watching may be more appropriate.

Pass

The conditions don't support a wager under the plan. There's nothing wrong with enjoying the race without betting.

A Pass isn't a failure to make a pick. It's a decision not to put money at risk when the opportunity doesn't justify it.

And even when a race is classified as Play, wagering is always your choice.

How The Paddock Approaches Exacta Decisions

An exacta requires picking the first two horses in the correct finishing order. It sounds simple, but identifying two contenders isn't necessarily the same as identifying a worthwhile exacta bet.

That's where The Paddock's approach comes in.

Rather than presenting a long list of horses and leaving you to figure everything out, The Paddock narrows the field to three primary contenders and evaluates how they might perform against one another.

Our approach considers several important questions:

- Which horses are the strongest contenders? We evaluate available racing information to identify horses with credible chances of competing.
- How might the contenders finish? We consider their relative strengths and the potential race dynamics, recognizing that predicting the exact finishing order is more difficult than identifying competitive horses.
- What do the betting prices suggest? We examine the available odds and, when reliable data is available, exacta pricing to help distinguish an interesting combination from one offering a limited potential return.

- Does the wager justify its cost? A three-horse, $1 exacta box costs $6. Even if one combination wins, the payout must exceed $6 for the overall ticket to make a profit.
- Is passing the better decision? Not every race offers an attractive opportunity. Sometimes the most useful recommendation is to avoid a wager.

A Simple Example

Suppose The Paddock identifies these three fictional contenders:

Horse	Assessment
#2 Copper Ridge	Top contender
#5 Harbor Light	Strong alternative
#7 Desert Echo	Possible longshot

A three-horse exacta box would cover six combinations for $6 at a $1 base wager.

But The Paddock's objective isn't simply to identify three horses and automatically recommend boxing them.

The more important question is whether the contenders, possible finishing orders, available prices, and ticket cost support a reasonable betting decision.

The goal is not more bets. It's better-informed decisions about which opportunities deserve consideration.

The Paddock does the initial analysis. You review the selections, understand the reasoning, and decide whether to play, proceed cautiously, or pass.

Step 5: Understand the Ticket Before Betting

Suppose you like all three contenders in our fictional Race 4.

You might consider an exacta box using #2, #5, and #7.

An exacta requires you to select the first two finishers in the correct order.

A three-horse box covers all six possible first-and-second combinations among those horses.

At $1 per combination, the ticket costs $6.

You could also choose a simple win wager on one contender or decide not to bet at all.

The Paddock's shortlist helps narrow your options, but the wager you choose should fit your budget and understanding of the race.

Never assume that including more combinations automatically makes a wager worthwhile.

Our Horse Racing Bet Types Explained guide walks through win, place, show, exacta, and trifecta wagers, including their costs.

Step 6: Enjoy the Race and Review the Results

Once you've made your decision, it's time to enjoy the race.

Watch how the contenders perform. Did the expected frontrunner take the lead? Did a longshot make a late move? Did the race unfold differently than anticipated?

You don't need to analyze every detail, but seeing how the selections perform makes racing more interesting.

After the race, compare The Paddock's contenders with the official finishing order.

Remember that identifying the right contenders isn't the same as producing a profitable wager.

For example, an exacta box could include the winning combination yet return less than the full cost of the ticket.

Over time, tracking selections, wagers, and results gives a clearer picture than judging the approach by a single winning or losing race.

Our How to Track Horse Racing Picks and Results guide explains what information is useful to record.

A Simple Race-Day Routine

You can use The Paddock in just a few steps:

1. Find the race you're interested in.
2. Review The Paddock's three contenders and their explanations.
3. Check the current odds.
4. Consider the Play, Caution, or Pass assessment.
5. Understand the cost and conditions of any wager you choose.
6. Enjoy the race and review the results.

You don't need to master every handicapping statistic or betting strategy before participating.

And you don't have to bet every race.

The Bottom Line

Horse racing should be enjoyable, not another homework assignment.

The Paddock Picks is designed for people who want useful information without spending their entire race day analyzing past performances.

We narrow the field, explain the contenders, and help make the wagering decisions easier to understand.

You decide what to do with that information.

Less data. Fewer choices. Better-informed bets.

Horse racing involves risk. No selection or betting strategy guarantees a winning result. Set a budget before wagering and never bet more than you can afford to lose.

Related guides

How to Identify Horse Racing Contenders

How to Read Horse Racing Odds

Horse Racing Bet Types Explained